data consumption, placing it ahead of other large markets like the US. However, wireless connectivity continues to account for bulk of India's data requirements.

"Today, India is transporting more data through its telecom networks than data transported by networks of US and China put together.

"Also, the data consumption in India is more than twice the average consumption of the US. But in case of India, about 93 per cent of the data is coming through wireless and seven per cent through fixed line," Sharma said.

In contrast, globally almost 46% of data is transported through fixed lines and 54% wireless in case of ratio 60% infra- and wireless infrastructure), and fixed line supports most of the broadband requirements for homes and offices.

"This is the deficit which we have. And obviously you cannot create a great scenario of using all the newer breeds of technology unless you have a robust infrastructure on ground.

Sharma said the full range of 5G applications will ensure that telecom is not just a vertical but the underlying platform for every sector.
